“It is not the object described that matters, but the light that falls on it”

Boris Pasternak

Natural and organic items draw us closer to the Earth and remind us that we are part of a wonderful and rare world. I collect these items on my walks and enjoy documenting them in my photography. Attention to light, shadow, texture, and shape to emphasize the character of my chosen subjects make them seem not so ordinary. Seeing the objects in a whole new way is what I hope to achieve in this presentation. I photograph subjects that I think have something to say: “look at my smooth surface, touch my texture, see my delicate existence, see how I catch the light”. Shooting my images in black and white excluding color, I draw the viewer in to see the base element of an object, instead of its color, therefor allowing the object to stand on its own elemental aspect.
